Why you should attend

Most ethics seminars revolve around individual resolution of specific ethical dilemmas. Borrowing from moral philosophy, the standard approach is to present a scenario and ask a person to resolve the dilemma. This approach is helpful in allowing participants to become conscious about their mode of moral reasoning, but it does little to change attitudes or ethical patterns that already exist and are pretty well set by the time we enter the workplace.

The Organizational Ethics presentation actually approaches ethical issues from the perspective of the organization. What can the organization do to prevent and reduce misconduct and encourage ethical behavior? From four domains of organizational behavior -- Organizational Culture, Structure, Leadership and Membership -- the course investigates some practical ways that an organization can reduce inappropriate, unethical or illegal conduct, and encourage ethical behavior.

Presenter

Neil Vance, Senior Lecturer in Applied Ethics, Eller College of Management
Dr. Neil Vance teaches both undergraduate and graduate Ethics courses at the University of Arizona, and he is a partner in Ethics LLC, an ethics consulting firm.
